Optimal health and well-being of a population requires sound public policy that is based on both evidence and the values of the relevant community. Translating research findings into coherent action is an imperfect science, yet has the potential to impact millions of lives. This talk will give several state and federal examples of how public policy is created and implemented.